As a current USAF radar troop I was very interested in finding a book about prior radar techs. I stumbled upon this one and have not been disappointed. I spend the majority of my year sitting with equipment in all the middle-of-nowheres all over the world. The special occurrences and bonds that form when people perform monotonous shift work isolated in extreme environments is one that I wouldn't trade for anything and it is one that this book captured wonderfully. You'll be glad to know I read it while on a deployment and have since passed it around the shop. Everyone loves it.

I too served on a remote radar site on Hokkaido during the Cold War. The author's stories were well done and the photos were great. It reminded me of some of my adventures there. I shared the book with a friend who happened to be a paymaster at Wakkanai. He also enjoyed the book.

The book "Site 18" written by Richard E. Waldron is, in my opinion, nothing short of a masterpiece. In the short stories he tells you can almost see the characters as well as smell the seaweed, the fish, the crabs and the honeybuckets. The book tells how life on a remote radar site during the Korean War and the Cold War was, and how miserable the remoteness and the winters at the radar sites on Hokkaido were. What I remember most is how the young men in that place and at that time made the most of it. They did not question why they were there; they just did their job - just like the young men did in all the wars before Korea and all the wars after Korea. There were some tragic times and there were some good times; there were some sad times and some happy times. I for one enjoyed the book. I was there.

Short stories with pictures from a small, isolated Air Force radar site in Japan during the Korean War and Cold War - including news reports of little-known Russian/American air conflicts. Humor, informal military life and off-the-wall activities at Site 18 compare loosely to television's 'MASH'.
